1. Field of the Invention This invention relates to a light beam scanning system for scanning a light beam to expose a recording medium such as a recording paper or the like. 2. Description of the Prior Art In a conventional system for scanning a light beam to a recording paper or the like, e.g. in a photomechanical printer, a halogen lamp is used as a light source and a polygon mirror is used as a scanning device. In this arrangement, a light beam from the light source is reflected by the polygon mirror and irradiates the recording paper to thereby expose a photosensitive layer to make a latent image. In this conventional system, however, it is difficult to obtain a large aperture for a light beam to scan a large recording paper because of the use of the polygon mirror. Accordingly, a large-diameter polygon mirror can not be applied in this system. Therefore, a direct exposure system wherein a light beam is projected onto the recording paper directly has recently been studied. In the direct exposure system, however, the light beam is reflected and irradiates an original to be copied, which is a problem of causing flare and a problem of the resultant paper passing through the light path between the original and the paper. To solve these problems, a system wherein the original is shifted, a plurality of reflections are made on a line, or the original is rotated has been considered. However, it is practically impossible to arrange a light source, an optical system, and other members used in this system in the above positions in the limited space in the direct exposure system. To cope with this problem, a rotary drum scanner has been developed for transferring the original on the drum as in the case of the conventional system. This drum scanner, however, requires the space sufficient for swinging the drum and, besides, is complicated. Therefore, the drum scanner is not practically employable. Magnetic resonance imaging
